

Russian police choir awkwardly sings 'Get Lucky' at Olympics opening ceremony

The Russian Ministry of Internal Affairs choir performs 'Get Lucky' by Daft Punk at the 2014 Winter Olympics Opening Ceremonies in Sochi, Russia.

By Chris Baker | cbaker@syracuse.com

Follow on Twitter

on February 07, 2014 at 4:24 PM

Print

Last month at the Grammy Awards, Daft Punk enlisted the help of Stevie Wonder, Niles Rogers and Pharrell to perform its blockbuster hit song 'Get Lucky.' The rousing performance proved the pinnacle of music's biggest night.

Not wanting to be outdone on its own big night, Russia tapped some government musicians to perform the tune: the Russian Ministry of Internal Affairs choir.

The militant-looking choir sang the song today at the opening ceremony for the 2014 Winter Olympics in Sochi.

Watch here as a group of men in full military garb "cut loose" in the most funk-less version of 'Get Lucky' imaginable.

Several of the choir members dove right into the groove of the song, dancing and smiling to the beat. Some others stood impossibly stoic and grim-faced. It was weird.

Members of the Russian Ministry of Internal Affairs choir sing 'Get Lucky'

See the segment from the opening ceremonies here. We'll let you decide who sings it better: the RMIA choir or Daft Punk.

This isn't the first time the choir has made waves on the web with 'Get Lucky.' See them in this YouTube video from last year: