

The Russian Red Army Choir have delivered the only cover of Pharrell's Happy you will ever need

2015-01-02 14:55:12

Given its popularity, it's no surprise that there's a fair few covers of Pharrell Williams' Happy knocking about – but this one may have just surpassed the lot of them.

It comes to us courtesy of Russia's Red Army Choir, who having previously taken on Adele's Skyfall and Daft Punk's Get Lucky in truly epic fashion, have now turned their attentions to the 2014 chart-topper.

And not content with just giving us their harmonious rendition of the track, a duo of singing policemen have also shown up to join in the fun – not to mention a traffic warden showing off his nifty moves.

This guy got moves. (Picture: YouTube)

Quite honestly, the only thing that could make this any better would be if they all showed up wearing Pharrell's trademark hat.

The choir was originally formed in 1939 to boost the morale of troops fighting in the Second World War – and gained a spot of international recognition when they performed at the Sochi Winter Olympics opening ceremony last year.

MORE: Russian police perform Daft Punk's Get Lucky, complete with stage smoke and bad dancing

